THE DERIVED LEADERSHIP TEACHER EDUCATION

Full-time tenure-track faculty positions in the institution of higher education are becoming increasingly scarce. This is due to a number of factors, including the reduction of state funding for higher education, the increase in the number of students, and the need for more faculty to teach and advise students. As a result, many institutions are turning to alternative methods of recruitment, such as the use of adjunct faculty and the hiring of part-time faculty. This document discusses the challenges of recruitment and retention of faculty in the derived leadership teacher education field and offers suggestions for addressing these challenges.
